The death of Mrs. Stella Hill, wife of Clayton Trask, occurred at her home on Dudley street yesterday, the result of a tubercular disease of long standing. The community was greatly shocked, for while the majority of her friends knew of her illness, the critical nature of the disease was generally unknown. Mrs. Trask had reached the age of 27 years only and was the mother of five children, the oldest being only ten years of age. She is also survived by her husband and her mother, Mrs. Florence Worthen, and three half-sisters, Mrs. Wesley Collins living at Bethel, Grace Wyman who is at present at Burlington, and Ethel who lives here in the family of W. ### WHAT ST. LOUIS COULD DO.

Its River Trade Could be Modernized and Develop Astounding Proportions.

"What has St. Louis ever done besides beg more water of the government?" asks John L. Mathews, after discussing the uses of which Europe puts its rivers, in the April number of Everybody's Magazine. "What means has it for handling river traffic, in case a man who owned a boat found a cargo wished to load or to unload there? At its water front a short stretch of sloping stone-paved levee leads to the edge of the stream, where half a dozen or more ancient hulks are anchored to serve as 'wharf boats.' There is no correlated railway service. Freight for some mysterious reason is to go by water, is teamed by mules down to the river and is dumped upon the levee. Negroes—the most costly 'power' to be found—carry these bundles by hand or on board trucks aboard the wharf boat, or upon the deck of the steamboat. Freight that comes by water must be laboriously dragged up the levee and distributed by wagon.

"Yet think of what St. Louis might have. Suppose the Chamber of Commerce, with the permission of Congress and of the state legislature and of the city government, decides to build a harbor, either on the Missouri side of the river or over in Illinois, in the intricate windings of Cahokia Creek. It is a bond, dig the haven, erects quays, bulks railway tracks along them, connects them with the belt and through railroads, leaves ample roadways for teaming, and provides warehouse and apparatus for loading and unloading. Then its merchants, no longer depending upon the ancient hulks, or upon the covered barges of the old-time Crescent line, have built for them at Pittsburg of Duquene a fleet of broad, shallow, steel barges of the Rhine type, constructed to load in good seasons of eight feet, or to carry, with economy, of four and a half. To tow these, the merchants build steel sterns or side-wheel towboats, also of the German and Austrian type of light draft and very powerful. Then they direct by rail into this haven the freight that their agents gather from the whole West and the whole of Illinois and even from Chicago, load it up, on their docks, and send them away, on the river, in the direction of New Orleans and the Gulf and the outer world; and back from New Orleans come rich cargoes to be distributed to all the West. If that were done, the city would as surely see its trade expand from a third of a million, which it has now, to ten million tons a year, as Breslau in Germany, has seen its own grow."
